Coronavirus, Las Vegas, Archives, and You

The photograph above looks completely desolate as the streets of the biggest entertainment city in America was temporarily closed for a couple weeks during the early outbreak of COVID-19. This photo shows that governors and states did require serious mandates and shut downs in the early stage but later let things get out of hand and didn't know what to do next. Hotels, clubs, restaurants, and the whole state of Nevada's revenue all come from entertainment and hospitality and when there are no people spending money, business take a financial deficit which is not good at all. In america money tends to have a say in things over things that actually matter for example people's well being. Having said more infections of the virus has not decreased but has steadily increased even more. No one knows if government leaders will make a change and nobody knows when their regular life comes back.
